The PhD Programme in Quantitative Methods in Economics hosts its annual Seminar Day, an opportunity for doctoral candidates to present their research projects, discuss the methods they are developing, share the results achieved so far, and outline the next steps in their work. The event encourages open scientific dialogue with the Faculty Board and participants, strengthening the research community and reflecting the variety of themes and quantitative approaches that characterise the QME programme.

Designed for students in the social sciences seeking rigorous training in economics, quantitative methods and policy evaluation, as well as for those with a quantitative background interested in applying their skills to economic policy issues, the programme combines international openness, interdisciplinarity and strong research orientation.
